Value data types and variables can be declared using a data type declaration. The following table shows the syntax of a data type declaration. You can also use type-name variables in your code. Use the data type declaration in a local variable or a constant variable (with a value) or a parameter (with an assigned value). To declare a variable, use the variable-name or data type part of a data type declaration and assign a value to it. To define a constant, use the data type part of the declaration and provide a value. Data types have different data types. You can use the variables or constants you defined with a data type declaration in any code block in the program. Data types and their data types are similar. You can use the data type of a constant or variable in a type or procedure. Use the data type of a variable in a type or procedure. Use a data type declaration in a procedure or in a class definition. To declare a variable, use the variable-name or data type part of a data type declaration and assign a value to it. To define a constant, use the data type part of the declaration and provide a value. You can use a data type declaration in a procedure or in a class definition. Data types are similar to variables, but the data types do not have a value assigned to them. A data type is the source of a data type. You can use a data type declaration to declare a data type. When you use a data type declaration, you can assign a data type name to a constant variable or a data type name to a variable. You can also use a data type in a statement or an assignment.
